SUNDAY, SEPTEMBER 15, 2019 – 6:30 AM WEATHER FORECAST

Just a trace of rainfall here at the club yesterday from the convection in the area. Might not be as lucky today! Monsoonal moisture is still in place (dew points in the 40s, along with some mid/high level clouds). A small area of low pressure in southeastern AZ will move north today. Showers and thunderstorms will be concentrated there, but we'll have to watch for some to make it this far west + development in Flagstaff. Rainfall chances peak at 60% from 2 to 4 PM. Could see something here before or after that, but lower odds. Still some monsoonal moisture around for tomorrow, and still a 40% chance of showers and storms. By Tuesday, we start to transition, as the monsoonal moisture should start retreating to the east, but still carrying a 30% chance for now. A more stable atmosphere returns for Wednesday and Thursday. Winds from the east and southeast today, and a bit gustier, with afternoon wind speeds approaching 25 mph. Southwest winds expected Monday and Tuesday, with winds gusting over 30 mph, especially Tuesday. At least we don't have to worry about frost, and the heavy rainfall south yesterday lowers the risk of any smoke drifting our way. High temperatures the next several days in the 70 to 75 degree range, with lows at night near 45.
